THIS WEEK'S BIG QUESTIONS

Are adults equipped to teach you about the online world?

- What help do you need from adults when navigating the online world?
- What do you think adults need to know about your online experience?
- Do you want adults to help you, or do you want support from people your own age?

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

- "We have campaigned strongly for change alongside brave survivors, families, young people and Parliamentarians to ensure the legislation results in a much safer online world for children." - Sir Peter Wanless, NSPCC CEO.
- "The Online Safety Act recently became law, and it will make Britain the safest place in the world to be online," - Michelle Donelan, Secretary of State for Science, Innovation & Technology.

A CLOSER LOOK: WHAT ARE COOKIES?

Do you ever wonder what people mean when they talk about cookies online? They're not actually talking about sweet treats, but an online tool that helps websites to remember what you look at on the internet.

Like all technological tools, this can be helpful and harmful. Cookies help websites to make your online experience run more smoothly. For example, if you visit a website that uses cookies, it will remember your username for you. If you're doing some online shopping, the website uses cookies to remember what you have chosen to buy.

On the other hand, some websites use cookies to share information about what you have been looking at with other businesses. These are called "third-party cookies". If you don't want your information being shared, there are ways that you can prevent it on your internet browser and on each website that you use.

YOUR COMPREHENSION QUESTIONS

- What are cookies?
- Are technological tools always helpful?
- Give an example of how cookies can make using the internet easier.
- What do "third-party cookies" do?
- Find and copy a synonym for the word "stop".
